When a company goes into liquidation under the Insolvency Act (IBC), what's done in the past doesn't just stay in the past. The insolvency process begins are closely looked into, especially by creditors. We need forensic checks in this place to find hidden dealings in liquidation cases.

Why are past transactions reviewed in liquidation cases?

Sections 43 to 49 of the IBC allow for a detailed review of transactions that have given unfair benefit to one party or drained company assets. This includes preferential deals, undervalued sales, or money moved out of the business by directors just before insolvency. The purpose is to trace anything unusual that could have hurt the financial health of the company.

Who needs this forensic review?

Primarily, it's the creditors, banks, lenders, and other financial institutions—who rely on these investigations. They need to know if money was taken out unfairly or if the company's directors tried to protect their own interests at the cost of others. It helps them understand the actual financial situation and if anything can be reversed or recovered.

What does forensic investigation under IBC involve?

The process involves a mix of financial analysis, review of bank statements, vendor transactions, related party deals, and accounting records. Forensic accountants use special tools to dig into old transactions and see if anything stands out. They look for signs of wrongdoing or red flags that a regular audit might miss.

This is different from regular accounting. Forensic Investigation Services are more detailed and sharper in identifying patterns, fake transactions, or round-tripping of funds. That's why having experts in Forensic Accounting & Forensic Accountants becomes crucial.

Can these findings really make a difference?

Yes. If suspicious transactions are found, the insolvency professionals can act. They may reverse those deals or ask the responsible parties to return the funds. It can help recover part of what's lost and ensure fair treatment to all creditors involved.

If you're looking for professional help in such matters, Master Brains offers focused Forensic Investigation Services handled by experienced Forensic Accountants. Their work can bring out the real picture behind the numbers and help support recovery in insolvency cases.
